Community Linking is sometimes called social prescribing

When we think about a prescription, we usually think about a piece of paper we take to the pharmacy to get medicine or tablets.

But there is not a 'pill for every ill'. Sometimes social issues like money, housing, relationships or loneliness make us feel stressed, anxious, or physically ill. We need to get these issues sorted out if we want to start feeling better.

This is what the Community Linking Project is all about. It means that GP's can focus on the medical problems that patients have, and the Community Link Workers can help with the wider issues, by linking patients up to services and activities in the community that can help them.

This way, patients get really effective help, and start feeling better more quickly.

'The team at Edberts have helped me to get out and meet people. My mental health has greatly improved... and I have felt a real boost in my confidence. Building friendships and connections has got me talking with different people and has helped to give me purpose and direction in my life, something which was hard to find after my wife passed away. There's no other way of putting it: it has helped to keep me alive.'
